Mepkin Abbey: Meditation & Mushrooms

Mepkin Abbey eased into the mushroom business five years ago, and now it is the largest mushroom grower in the state. This specialty crop replaced the egg business which helped support the abbey for decades.

The abbey, which was originally Mepkin Plantation, has a centuries-old tradition of sustainable harmony with nature. The plantation dates back to the Revolutionary War, when statesman Henry Lawrence was given 10,000 acres on the Cooper River near Moncks Corner. Eventually acquired by publishers Henry and Clare Booth Luce, the remaining 3,200 acres was donated to the Trappist monks in 1949.

The Trappist philosophy embodies the spirit of sustainability. Dedicated to prayer and meditation, the monks sustain themselves through the work of their hands. For many years they had a profitable chicken and egg business, but complaints from animal-rights groups caused them to close it. They needed another source of income that suited their lifestyle.

Using the buildings that once housed chickens, they began experimenting with growing mushrooms.

"The infrastructure was already there," explained administrator Robbie Metz. "They had the big coolers, and they have re-purposed the buildings to grow mushrooms."

Oyster mushrooms, which have a delicate flavor, grow best on plastic-wrapped logs.

Mepkin Abbey specializes in oyster and shiitake mushrooms, but each requires its own environment and growing medium. These shiitake mushrooms take about two weeks to reach maturity.

Mepkin produces two types of mushrooms: oyster and shiitake. Since mushrooms are finicky, each type has its own building, ventilation system, and growing medium. Now selling about 1,600 pounds of mushrooms each week, the abbey is hard pressed to keep up with the demand from local chefs and retail outlets.

Production manager Jimmy Livingston explained the complicated process of growing mushrooms. They need a sterile environment, with the air at a constant 63 degrees. Specially manufactured "logs" are the host for the fungus, which doubles in size each day. The mushrooms start to mature in about two weeks. The logs are harvested daily, except Sunday, as they reach the perfect size for discerning local restaurants.

"This small stem size makes chefs giggle," Livingston said, showing a perfect oyster mushroom. Much in demand, the oysters have a delicate flavor, while the shiitakes are earthier. Both types of mushrooms are also dried on site and packaged for sale.

The abbey could double its production of mushrooms, but that would require additional facilities and additional expenses. For now, the monks are concentrating on quality rather than quantity.

Visitors to Mepkin Abbey can buy fresh or dried mushrooms in the gift shop. Several local grocery stores also sell them. Visit www.mepkinabbey.org for more information and directions to the abbey.

Lever Hall of Fame

Growing up and then over the years at our dairy farm, I have known many Extension agents who have gone beyond the call of duty. Clemson Extension Service recently inducted three outstanding agents into the Lever Hall of Fame. Bill Craven, Bill Riser, and Rowland Alston were honored recently at the Phillips Center at the State Farmers Market. It was a wonderful tribute to these honorees who have contributed many years of service, and I was privileged to give remarks to the group.

I think almost anyone who lives in South Carolina has called on a Clemson Extension agent for advice at some point or another. They help folks with anything from agriculture to food safety and nutrition, economic development, and 4-H programs. They just know how to make things grow – and help our communities grow stronger.

The Lever Hall of Fame honorees exemplify this commitment to agriculture. They all helped our citizens over many years and they have helped our state's economy grow.

Bill Craven worked for Clemson Extension for 36 years. He is the man who gave Saluda County the name, "Land of 5 P Farming: Ponds, Pastures, Peaches, Poultry, and Pines." He worked hard to create several farmer-owned cooperatives, including Central Milk Producers, Saluda Artificial Breeding Cooperative, and Ridge Farmers Mutual. He did weekly radio shows and newspaper articles and was a much sought-after speaker.

Fruit Specialist Honored

Guido Schnabel

Clemson University fruit specialist Guido Schnabel earned national recognition for helping fruit growers across the East Coast manage disease.

The American Phytopathological Society will award Schnabel its annual Excellence in Extension award at a ceremony in August in Pasadena, California. This award recognizes one professional nationally from the Cooperative Extension Service for excellence in plant pathology.

In a multiple-university research collaborative led by the University of Florida, Schnabel launched an innovative program in 2010 that gives fruit growers steps to combat fungicide resistance. He created a resistance-management program that allows growers from Pennsylvania to Georgia to submit pathogens to Clemson to be analyzed. After receiving flower samples, Schnabel responds in eight days with a location-specific management plan for each grower.

"Nobody wants to spray, and spend money on, pesticides that do not work," he said. "Growers are much more conscientious now about spraying than they were in the past."

Schnabel's adaptation of new technologies has greatly simplified disease management for growers. He led a team to create a smartphone app for providing critical disease information for strawberry and peach producers.

A plant pathologist and professor of agricultural and environmental sciences, Schnabel is also the 2015 recipient of the Godley-Snell Award for Excellence in Agricultural Research, one of Clemson University's highest agricultural honor.

Lever Hall of Fame

After he retired from Extension, Bill worked for Amick Farms of Saluda. He is a strong supporter of Edisto Research Station and the Agricultural Museum at Blackville.

The next honoree, Bill Riser, is a big man in works and stature. Bill is a native of my hometown of Bowman and played basketball at Clemson. He worked in Aiken, Saluda, and Richland counties. He built one of the strongest 4-H agriculture programs in the state, covering dairy, beef, swine, and poultry. His 4-H judging teams were regular state winners.

He helped start the Saluda County Cattleman's Association, the Annual Feeder Calf Sales, and the Saluda Fatstock Shows. He wrote ag columns and had a TV show, "The Early Riser Show." After he retired from Extension service, he served as a member of the S.C. House of Representatives for 11 years.

Rowland Alston of Sumter County is best known for the award-winning ETV show "Making It Grow," which he developed, planned and conducted. Not only did the show greatly increase the visibility of Clemson Extension, it reached a large new audience that had been previously untouched.

Rowland, a great spokesman for agriculture and gardening, is widely recognized as an authority on production agriculture. He was a master at using the media to get the message of agriculture out to the people.

The Cooperative Extension Service is a legacy of Frank Lever, who is best remembered for the Smith-Lever Act of 1914. This legislation established Extension services at state agricultural colleges to teach new farming techniques. The face of agriculture was transformed from 19th century modes to more modern and scientific 20th century methods of farming.

The Francis Lever Hall of Fame is a strong symbol of how we are all working together in the agriculture community. The Hall of Fame was created last year to celebrate the 100th anniversary of the Clemson Cooperative Extension Service, and there is a great deal of history that goes along with this story. Lever also insured the passage of many acts that pertained to agriculture, including the Federal Farm Loan Act, which created the Farm Credit Administration.

Lever's contributions have helped shape the success of agriculture in South Carolina. Over the past 100 years, some pretty strong working relationships have developed in the farming community because of Clemson Extension's excellent service. Tremendous advancements are being made in farming as a result of their ag research and education.

If you happen to see one of these Hall of Fame honorees, be sure to congratulate them for their service, and a job well done.

Farm to Preschool Culinary Training a Big Hit

For the third year in a row, the South Carolina Farm to Institution program collaborated with faculty from the University of South Carolina School of Hotel, Restaurant, and Tourism faculty to offer culinary training to preschool food preparers.

The day began with a brief presentation by USC Executive Chef Bill Knapp. He touched on many key components of the Farm to Preschool program, including the use of local products, creating healthy, lifelong eating habits, and kitchen safety tips.

The participants were given the opportunity to put their new knowledge to use in the kitchen. They were taught how to use a knife and peeler properly on different vegetables to help prepare the food for the day.

Chef Joel Reynolds used the food that was prepared to showcase a variation on recipes that can be cooked in high-yields, using only a few ingredients and not too much attention. The recipes feature locally sourced fresh ingredients, which vary by season, so that preschools can offer these recipes year-round. The nine recipes prepared during the seminar were all cooked in less than two hours.

Janice Ironside, director of MEGA Child Development Center in Gilbert, said there was a lot to take away from the experience. She learned a lot about how to incorporate herbs into meals. "We have five gardens and we have a lot of herbs, and until now I didn't really know how to cook with them. Who knew adding mint to watermelon is so refreshing?"

Core components of the South Carolina Farm to Institution program include increasing the number of farmers that are certified to provide locally grown products to schools; providing education to food service staff and teachers on Farm to School practices; and providing hands-on learning activities to promote healthy eating among school children. Knapp explained that if the children are in the garden from the beginning, then they have a sense of ownership over the food and are more likely to try it or eat it.

In the upcoming months, the Farm to Institution program will host two more culinary training sessions geared toward food preparers for kindergarten to 12th grade.
