Certified SC Grown Program Exceeds Membership Goal as Demand for Buying Local Grows

The Certified SC Grown program recently surpassed its membership goal of 1,500. When the South Carolina Department of Agriculture (SCDA) started the effort to brand locally grown agricultural products seven years ago, 60 farmers took part.

Currently there are 1,536 Certified SC Grown members from the produce, dairy, livestock, fish and seafood, ornamental horticulture and specialty food categories. The most recent survey found that a third of Certified SC members indicated the branding program helped them develop new markets, and more than 50 per cent credit the program with an increase in sales.

“More and more South Carolinians expect to see the Certified SC Grown logo where they shop. Our state is home to many incredible farmers, and people can truly taste the difference when they buy Certified SC Grown. This effort is helping increase the demand for locally grown and that benefits our state’s economy,” said Commissioner of Agriculture Hugh Weathers.

Since the creation of Certified SC Grown, SCDA also launched Fresh on the Menu, which features more than 370 restaurants serving Certified SC Grown, and the Certified SC Seafood branding.

Spring at Last!

Is there a more eagerly awaited season than spring? After a long spell of wet, cold weather, we are all happy to see the cheery yellow daffodils blooming. The deep lush green wheat fields offer a beautiful backdrop to other crops that will soon be following.

Farmers like to get their corn planted in March—assuming the ground isn’t too wet. Peach trees are starting to set their buds, and a friend told me that his pet hens have started laying eggs again—apparently they took the winter off. Farmers all over the state are gearing up for spring planting. It’s a season of hope and renewal.

With the warmer weather, people naturally want to be outdoors, and our calendars are full of upcoming events. One of our favorites is the Carolina Cup in Camden. Billed as the biggest outdoor party in the state, the Cup is the Palmetto State’s version of the Kentucky Derby. Fancy clothes and luscious tailgating food are the backdrop for a day of exciting horse races. This annual event is a must for college students, who now have their own section at the racetrack.

If you look past the sundresses, big fancy hats, bow ties and sport coats, you’ll see another world—the most exciting Thoroughbred horse racing the state has to offer.

Fine horses are a tradition in South Carolina that dates back to the founding of the colonies. Charleston, Columbia, Aiken, Kingstree, Holly Hill, St. Matthews and many other towns had their own racetracks—indeed, many small towns are still turning out fine racehorses.

Sarratt named Cattleman of the Year

Bill Sarratt, the Cattleman of the Year

The SC Cattlemen’s Association named Bill Sarratt of Spartanburg County the 2013 Cattleman of the Year at its annual meeting in March.

“Bill exemplifies the definition of a progressive cattleman,” said Roy Copelan, executive director of the SC Cattlemen’s Association. “He has spent the past 10 years developing his operation to best suit his customers. He has integrated Angus genetics into his original herd and he is known for outstanding customer service.”

According to his website, what started as Sarratt’s dream in 2004 has developed into a 600-head integrated cattle operation in the Upstate of South Carolina. His goal was simple: “to breed functional cattle.” He has developed Sarratt Farms into one of the leading purebred Angus operations in South Carolina.

Cattleman of the Year

The farm’s genetic goal is to breed cattle that can perform in all aspects of production with strong growth, good carcass merit, and strong maternal and phenotypic traits. The use of artificial insemination and embryo transfer are key elements of the operation. The farm keeps an average of 10 superior donor cows for embryo transplant. They are flushed to the best bulls available in order to improve the breed.

The primary source of income for the farm is generated through two annual sales, a performance-tested bull sale in the spring, and an annual production sale in the fall featuring top females.

In 2011 Sarratt added Sim-Angus, a cross between the Angus and Simmental breeds.

Lewis Harrison, president of Walnut Grove Auction in Roebuck, said Sarratt began with top quality genetics and has continued to improve. “He has built a reputation in the industry with integrity and has established himself as a leader.”

Sarratt Farms also puts a great deal of effort into farming. They grow their own corn silage and hay, in addition to planting soybeans and operating 14 broiler houses. The fertilizer from the poultry houses is then used to enrich the soil on the rest of the farm.

Sarratt said the future looks good for the cattle industry, as well as for his farm. He will produce more bulls and maybe more bred heifers in the next few years.

“As more and more people around the world have a little money in their pockets, and are able to eat more than beans and rice, if they try beef, they will like it. That will impact our exports,” he said.

Just feeding the world’s population will be a challenge, he continued. “I think beef and agriculture in general are in for some good years.”

Spring at Last!

The real stars of Carolina Cup are the horses. Sleek, fit, and well groomed, these horses represent thousands of jobs in South Carolina and offer a huge boost to the economy. A recent survey by our department shows that every three racehorses equal one job. And as a trainer recently told us, most of those jobs are local—often in rural areas where good-paying jobs are scarce.

If you’re fortunate enough to watch the horses in the paddock before the races, take a good look at the people with them. Each horse will have at least three people in attendance: the groom, the trainer, and the jockey. Be assured the owners are also standing close by. It’s estimated that South Carolina trainers have a $20 million annual payroll.

Cot Campbell, an owner, trainer and legend in the world of Thoroughbred horses, estimates the racing industry in South Carolina to be worth $200 million dollars. His own Dogwood Stables owns Palace Malice, winner of last year’s Belmont Stakes and a cool $1.5 million to boot.

Now let’s circle back to agriculture. These horses need pasture, hay, oats and corn, which our farmers can provide. Another little-known commodity that horses use is wheat straw. Jeff Teter, the manager of Springdale Race Course in Camden, said the barns there use about 10,000 bales of straw a year. At $4 per bale, that’s a lot of money that could be going in local farmers’ pockets.

With the popularity of no-till farming, most farmers disk their wheat straw into the ground after the crop is harvested. What if some of those farmers—instead of a tractor and disk—ran a hay baler over that same acreage? If they can get $4 a bale for straw, would that be worth the effort? Jeff tells us that statewide, the racehorse industry uses 500,000 bales of straw—now we’re talking some serious money for agriculture!

Our department will have a booth at the Cup, where we’ve invited some racehorse trainers to talk to people about the racing industry. Stop by and see them. Ask questions and learn about this great sport and the people who dedicate their lives to racing. Think about the money spent on jobs and agricultural products. We’re hoping that many of our legislators with racetracks in their districts will join us.

Get out and enjoy spring in South Carolina.

Come to the Races!

The Carolina Cup is the most popular horse event in South Carolina, bar none. With some 65,000 to 70,000 spectators, The Cup offers an afternoon of exciting Thoroughbred races at the Springdale Race Course in Camden. It’s the Palmetto State’s version of the Kentucky Derby. The featured race has a purse of $50,000.

The gates open at 9 a.m. March 29, with vendors of every description offering fine merchandise. Post time for the first race is 1:30 p.m.

Tickets are $45 after March 15. For more information, call 800-780-8117 or 803-432-6513, or visit www.carolina-cup.org. The racetrack is located at 200 Knights Hill Road, Camden.

Greenville Market Spaces to Open April 5

Local farmers and vendors have a place to market their products to consumers at the Greenville Farmers Market. The retail area is a popular gathering place as local farmers return with their farm fresh produce.

The 2014 opening for the daily sales rental area for retail spaces will be Saturday, April 5 at 7 a.m. In addition to seasonal fruits and vegetables, many bedding plants and flowers will also be available.

“It is often difficult to determine whether the most wholesome offering is the nutritious fruits and vegetables, or the social atmosphere which characterizes a day at the market,” said market manager Ardonia Summerall. “So come out and help celebrate the 2014 seasonal opening. Start your spring gardening projects and see what local fresh foods are available.”

For further information on renting a space contact Ardonia Summerall, Greenville State Farmers Market, at 864-244-4023 or asummerall@scda.sc.gov.
