FIELD DAYS OFFER WEALTH OF INFORMATION

EDISTO REC'S FALL FIELD DAY FOCUSES ON PEANUTS

STORY AND PHOTOS BY MARSHA HEWITT

BLACKVILLE—Farmers from all over the state converged on Clemson University's Edisto Research and Education Center to learn more about peanuts, sorghum, cotton and soybeans at the September 6 Peanut Field Day.

The day-long event offered the latest in variety trials, advances in technology, disease and insect management, and recommended practices.

For example, the most important advice offered the risk factors go up, your speed should go down.”

Farmers closely examined the test plots, with a variety of soils, seeding rates, pesticides, and row spacing, among other things. They were encouraged to ask questions throughout the day as they were transported from field to field.

From a morning of peanuts, the field day progressed to other crops. Cotton is an excellent rotation crop for peanuts, while soybeans

Farmers take advantage of expert demonstrations at the Edisto Research Center's Fall Field Day, with peanuts featured in the morning.

Dr. Jose Payero explains how moisture levels in the soil determine the amount of irrigation.

Slowing down the speed of the combine is the best way to reduce peanut loss in the field. Farmers could save up to 200 pounds per acre by harvesting at 2 mph or less.

The latest technology includes soil moisture sensors, explained by Dr. Michael Plumlee, left. The probes detect the amount of moisture in the soil, indicate when irrigation is needed, and how much natural rainfall is used by the plants.

During the field day, farmers examine different plots of cotton, soybeans, sorghum, and peanuts and are able to see differences in the varieties.

by peanut specialist Kendall Kirk was to slow the speed of the combine when harvesting. “If you exceed the optimal speed you could lose 200 pounds per acre,” he said. “As can harbor some of the same insects. Identifying the insects is crucial since there are no insecticides that are effective across the board, according to the experts.

Informative sessions on technology included soil moisture sensors as well as new or modified equipment that can increase yields. Knowing which variety to plant can also reduce insect and disease, both of which are costly.

Field days are held at appropriate times during the year at Clemson's three research stations. Farmers are encouraged to visit Edisto, Pee Dee REC and Charleston REC to see the latest in research firsthand.

BACK TO (AGRIBUSINESS) SCHOOL

From the buses I see on the highways, I'm guessing that students in South Carolina have been back in school for about a month now, settling into familiar routines and schedules. It still feels a lot like summer outside, but school bells, carpool schedules and football games remind even us big kids that it's time to learn new things.

We're looking for some big kids who want to learn a new thing: agribusiness. Specifically, our Agribusiness Center for Research and Entrepreneurship (ACRE) is looking for innovators who want to be agribusiness entrepreneurs and need some business and marketing know-how. ACRE is partnering with Clemson Cooperative Extension to launch a curriculum program for those who have an idea or product prototype and would benefit from a curriculum covering topics such as pricing, production cost, profitability, financial statements, and management.

Applications for this program are due on September 28 and can be found at www.acre-sc.com. Participants must commit to class sessions on October 23, November 6 and 20, and December 11. During the December session, participants will pitch their business plans to an agribusiness panel for the opportunity to win $5,000. All classes will be taught by Clemson's Agribusiness Program Team and will take place at the Clemson Sandhills Research and Education Center in Columbia.

If some of this sounds familiar, it's probably because I've written several columns about ACRE over the last six months or so. We created ACRE to combine agriculture, research and entrepreneurship in one initiative that provides new opportunities for economic growth in South Carolina. ACRE has several areas of emphasis: research, entrepreneurship, agribusiness development grants, SC Farm Link and local food/logistics. The agribusiness curriculum program is the second track in the Entrepreneurship Center of ACRE.

Even if you're not interested in becoming an entrepreneur, you still have a stake in the success of ACRE. As I've said many times, the Department of Agriculture is working towards the 50 x 20 goal: to increase the economic impact of agribusiness in our state to $50 billion by 2020. Right now we're at about $42 billion, and the future looks bright because of the bright minds in SC agriculture. ACRE will help make South Carolina even more attractive to businesses looking to expand or relocate.

After all, agribusiness is the state's number one industry, and that's one fact I hope all South Carolinians know by heart.
