DURING PANDEMIC, AGRITOURISM FARMS GET CREATIVE

BY EVA MOORE

When the coronavirus pandemic struck the United States in early 2020, Denver Downs Farm had to cancel its annual Easter egg hunt and other spring events.

By fall, though, things had changed. With COVID-19 protocols that included masked employees, temperature checks, and a sanitation crew that cleans high-contact surfaces throughout the day, Denver Downs opened its farm for seasonal activities including a corn maze, pumpkin patch and pig races.

“This fall we were not expecting that many people to want to check out the farm,” says Catherine

Davis, co-owner of Denver Downs, a century farm in Anderson. “We were very surprised and happy when people really did show up.”

In the early days of the pandemic, like nearly all businesses, agritourism farms took a hit. Schools closed, cancelling the weekday field trips that bring in revenue and young visitors to learn about farming. Some U-pick berry farms opened while others remained closed, reflecting early uncertainty about the best ways to protect against the virus. Large events were restricted by the order of the governor.

But as the pandemic wore on, South Carolinians began to seek out agritourism activities. And farms began to find ways to safely invite people onto their properties.

“I think people are realizing they can get outside,” says Jackie Moore, director of the South Carolina Agritourism Association. “I think people are finding out how much fun it is.”

Her organization is actually growing, Moore notes:

an open-air environment, 4,000 is still too many people,” notes the Rembert, SC farmer. Instead, she’s hosted some smaller events, asking for donations rather than the usual admission fee. She opens her farm store each Thursday and Friday from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., and serves lunch on Fridays. She’s also signed up with Harvest Hosts, a website that helps people find scenic places – like farms – to park their RVs for a night.

Other farms have found ways to adapt to the online world of COVID-19. McLeod Farms, for example, created a Virtual Pumpkin Field Trip and posted it to YouTube. The video includes a walkthrough of the farm’s pumpkin patch, storytime, and a lesson on farming methods used at the farm. Schools can even order pumpkins from the farm so their students can make a hands-on connection to the virtual field trip.

Many farms have moved to online ticket sales, with some requiring timed admission to avoid crowding, says Moore. She expects online ticketing to remain an important part of agritourism even after the pandemic.

Through it all, Denver Downs’ Davis says she’s tried to adapt and keep moving.

“We try to stay positive during all this,” Davis says. “A lot of times in agriculture things are out of your control, so you stay with what you can control.”

“We’ve had an upswing in membership since COVID.”

Of course, things are still difficult for farmers, including those that make money off agritourism.

Old McCaskill Farm’s 2019 Fall Family Farm Day drew almost 4,000 people in one day – but this year, Kathy McCaskill felt she had to cancel both her spring and fall events.

“Even though we’re

SOUTH CAROLINA COMMISSIONER OF AGRICULTURE

FAREWELL TO 2020

Hard to believe 2020 is drawing to a close. Most years, when you look back over the preceding 12 months, there are lots of themes and events that stick out. In 2020, COVID is pretty much the story. Somehow it will be a relief just to see 2021 on the calendar.

But 2020 has been a rich year nonetheless. From steak to paper towels, the average American learned a lot about the efficiencies and challenges of the agricultural supply chain. Farmers market attendance is up, and people are searching out local food to support farmers and their communities. It will be interesting to watch what I hope will be a positive post-COVID impact for agriculture.

We’ve all had to adapt, in big ways and small. I’ll give you a small example: I was invited to sing at the Governor’s Carolighting, the annual kickoff to the holiday season at the South Carolina State House. This year, attendance was already capped due to the coronavirus – and then bad weather threatened the outdoor event. But this is an important event for South Carolinians, and it seemed especially important this year. So we adapted, and moved the event inside, and it came off well. SCETV broadcast it on air and online for everyone to enjoy.

This year we’ve also learned that some things don’t change. Like the grit and resilience of farmers, or the generosity of our neighbors. That generosity made our Farmers to Food Banks program a great success, distributing some 20,000 boxes of fresh produce to South Carolina families.

After the holidays, January marks the beginning of “meeting season,” as I like to call it. Agricultural organizations like to hold their annual meetings at the beginning of the year, but with the pandemic still going on – and in some places, getting worse – many are holding meetings online or have cancelled them altogether. I’ll miss the chance to see farmers gathered together at these meetings. We’ve all gotten used to Zoom gatherings, but they’re just not the same.

For now, my wish is for you and your family to have a Merry Christmas! And with the Advent season upon us, I hope that you experience hope, love, joy, and peace to the fullest. I hope the New Year brings health and stability to this world that we share – and to your little corner of it.

MORE FARMS NEED TRAINING AS PRODUCE SAFETY INSPECTIONS EXPAND IN 2021

South Carolina farmers should prepare for training and on-farm inspections as more small farms become subject to the Produce Safety Rule.

The Produce Safety Rule is part of the FDA Food Safety Modernization Act (FSMA) passed in 2011. It sets federal regulatory standards for the production, harvest and handling of fruits and vegetables in an effort to prevent microbial contamination and reduce foodborne illnesses associated with fresh produce.

Produce Safety Rule compliance has been phased in over several years. In 2021, all farm size categories will be subject to routine Produce Safety Rule inspections and training requirements. This includes farms with covered produce sales in the following ranges: Large Farms ($500,000+), Small Farms ($250,000-$500,000) and, for the first time, Very Small Farms ($25,000-$250,000).

The South Carolina Department of Agriculture (SCDA) has scheduled all six trainings it intends to hold in 2021, with the first two held online (Jan. 27-28 and Feb. 18-19) and subsequent trainings held in Columbia (April 28 and Nov. 16), Greenville (July 13) and Charleston (Sept. 29). Visit agriculture.sc.gov/produce-safety to view dates and a link to register. Sessions will be held in conjunction with Clemson Cooperative Extension, and cover such topics as worker health and hygiene; water safety; soil amendments; and postharvest handling.

Some produce farms may be exempt from the Produce Safety Rule. Visit ps exemption.agriculture.sc.gov to view exemption requirements and apply. Farms must reapply for exemption every year.

Contact Brooke Horton, SCDA's Produce Safety Outreach Coordinator, at bhorton@scda.sc.gov with further questions.

WHAT'S THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN DOMESTICATED AND WILD TURKEYS?

BY SOUTH CAROLINA DEPARTMENT OF NATURAL RESOURCES

There are many who think about the crisp, spring air that surrounds the beginning of a good turkey hunting season. But for a much larger population of people, when they think of a turkey, they think about being surrounded by their loved ones and are reminded of all the things they are thankful for.

Not only are we talking about two completely different seasons, but we are also talking about two completely different birds.

While bearing the same species name, domestic and wild turkeys share little else in common.

DOMESTIC AND WILD TURKEYS HAVE DIFFERENT FEATHER COLORS.

The easiest distinction between a wild turkey or a domestic turkey is simply what color its feathers are. Wild Turkeys have the deep, rich brown and black feathers that most people associate with turkeys. Domestic turkeys are normally white, an intentional product of domestication because white pin feathers are less noticeable on the carcass.

"WOOD SMARTS" VS. "NOT-SO-SMART"

Wild turkeys are able to survive in the woods amongst predators. With acute eyesight, the ability to catch speeds of 55 mph while in flight, the wild turkey is much better suited to the woods than its cousin, the domestic turkey, who has lost its instincts and physical attributes for survival in the wild.

TURKEYS HAVE BEEN DOMESTICATED FOR CENTURIES.

Turkey relics dating as far back as 25 A.D. suggest that Native Americans domesticated turkeys before Europeans ever set foot on the continent and that turkey-raising may well be one of the oldest forms of organized meat production in the Northern Hemisphere.

Spanish explorers took Mexican wild turkeys domesticated by the Aztecs home to Europe in about 1519 where they spread rapidly through Europe. They were introduced in England between 1524 and 1541 and became highly sought after for gourmet dinners.

After the domestic turkey spread across Europe in the 1500s, the colonists who settled the New World brought these tasty birds with them across the Atlantic back to the land of their origin.

Restoration of the wild turkey in South Carolina is one of the Palmetto State's most noteworthy conservation success stories. Limited by the early 1900s to small pockets of birds in the Lowcountry's Francis Marion National Forest and along the Savannah River swamps, the wild turkey is now widespread throughout South Carolina and a spring hunting season is held in all of the state's 46 counties (there is no fall season). Wild turkey restoration was made possible through the efforts of the SCDNR, the National Wild Turkey Federation, the forest products industry, private landowners, and South Carolina sportsmen and sportswomen.

IT'S ILLEGAL TO RELEASE PEN-RAISED TURKEYS.

State law prohibits the release of pen-raised turkeys due to the possibility of introducing disease and the danger of contaminating the wild turkey gene pool. But going back to the lack of "wood smarts" of their wild cousins, domestic turkeys generally fall prey to a host of hungry predators such as bobcats, foxes, or coyotes before getting a chance to breed with native birds.

USDA SCHOLARSHIPS PROMOTE STUDY OF AG SOUTH CAROLINA STATE UNIVERSITY IS AMONG PARTICIPATING SCHOOLS

The U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) is currently accepting applications for scholarships to help students build a career path in agriculture, food, natural resource sciences, and other agriculture-related subjects.

The USDA/1890 National Scholars Program was established in 1992 in partnership between USDA and 19 historically black universities that were established under the Second Morrill Act of 1890. South Carolina State University is among the participating universities. The program provides full tuition, fees, books, room and board, and a summer internship to students pursuing degrees in agriculture, food, natural resource sciences, or related academic disciplines. When the student has completed the academic and summer work requirements of the scholarship, USDA may convert the student to a permanent employee without further competition. The application deadline is January 31, 2021. To apply, visit usda.gov/partnerships/1890NationalScholars.

The USDA 1994 Tribal Scholars Program was established in 2008 in partnership between USDA and 1994 institutions, tribally controlled colleges and universities with land-grant status. The program provides full tuition, fees, books, and a summer internship to students pursuing degrees in agriculture, food, natural resource sciences, or related academic disciplines. When the student has completed the academic and summer work requirements of the scholarship, USDA may convert the student to a permanent employee without further competition. The application deadline is January 31, 2021. To apply, visit usda.gov/partnerships/1994-program.

CLEMSON RESEARCHERS STUDY USING ROBOTS TO PROMOTE BETTER FORAGES, SOIL MANAGEMENT

BY DENISE ATTAWAY AND MALAYSIA S. BARR, CLEMSON UNIVERSITY

CLEMSON, S.C. – Much like tractors, robots are becoming common fixtures in agriculture and a Clemson University research team believes robots can help producers save money while ensuring high quality forage for livestock and better management of soil.

The team, directed by Bulent Koc of Clemson’s agricultural mechanization and business program, has received a $423,263 grant from the U.S. Department of Agriculture National Institute of Food and Agriculture (USDA-NIFA) for a three-year study to develop forage quality and quantity measurement systems for precision pasture management. Research takes place on the university’s main campus and at the Simpson Research Farm in Pendleton. The farm is part of the Clemson Piedmont Research and Education Center.

“Specifically, we will use unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs) and ground rovers (robots) for this study,” Koc said. “We will use these UAVs to collect aerial images for developing crop surface models and vegetation indices of pasture fields and develop ground rovers to measure biomass height and biomass quality. Next, we will integrate aerial and ground measurements for the assessment of pasture quality and pasture yield predictions.”

Other project leaders are Matias Aguerre of animal and veterinary sciences, along with Matt Burns, Clemson Cooperative Extension Service beef specialist and livestock and forages program team leader, and John Chastain, also of agricultural mechanization and business.

Forage quality and quantity directly affect animals’ weight, milk production and reproductive abilities. Livestock producers need to know the quality and nutritional value of the pasture to obtain optimal forage utilization and high animal growth rates.

STUDENTS BENEFIT

Brendan MacInnis from Clover and Curtis Erwin from Mooresville, North Carolina, both master’s degree students in agricultural mechanization and business, and Manuel Peña, a doctoral student in animal and veterinary sciences, from Colombia, are working on the project as well.

“We are putting together technology and agricultural practices to help producers, while at the same time improving use of the soil,” Peña said.

Knowing biomass quality and quantity is important for producers who want to be on top of their business. This knowledge can help producers efficiently use their soils, their pastures and their animals.

“Having this knowledge helps producers make decisions on when and how to use the resources they have available,” Peña said. “However, taking these measurements is tedious and time consuming. For this reason, most of the producers do not take these measurements, which often results in poor planning and waste of feed which also means money lost.”

Developing robots to take these measurements can save time and money, while enhancing production systems.

Erwin and MacInnis said knowledge they’ve gained from being in the Clemson agricultural mechanization and business program has been beneficial in working on this project.

“The main task we have been focusing on this semester is the design and development of an electric mechanism to collect samples of various forage crops,” Erwin said. “Through the work on the sampling mechanism, we have developed skills related to being on an engineering team, such as forming a schedule and following the design process to properly define the problem, brainstorm ideas, develop prototypes and test them.”

MacInnis credits knowledge gained while taking a forage class, among other courses, as helping him. He is interested in a career that focuses on aerial technology and using this technology in agriculture.

“It has been very rewarding working with and learning from robotics experts,” MacInnis said. “We have been very fortunate to have people with this expertise help us along the way.”

BEEF AND DAIRY INDUSTRIES BENEFIT

Sustainable forage systems are needed for the United States’ beef and dairy industries. The team will validate using remote sensing units, such as rovers and drones, as tools to estimate pasture yields and quality under both controlled and farm-like conditions. The drones and rovers will be used to determine forage yields and quality assessments of ryegrass, tall fescue, bermudagrass and alfalfa.

“There is a need for accurate measurement of forage quality and quantity in pasture for optimal livestock management,” Aguerre said. “Favorable climate conditions exist in the Southeastern United States to allow forage to be produced for longer periods than in other parts of the country. But because of labor and other tasks involved in obtaining these measurements, cattle producers are not usually maximizing this competitive advantage.”

The researchers say measuring forage quality and quantity with field robotics will reduce the drudgery of pasture monitoring and improve the quality of life for cattle producers. Frequent measurements of pastures will increase pasture utilization by optimizing stocking rates and durations of grazing, as well as reduce dependence on supplemental feeding. Finally, precise measurement of forage yields will minimize over-application of plant nutrients, thus reducing input costs and environmental impacts of cattle production.

“Hence, the profitability and sustainability of pasture-based cattle production will increase,” Aguerre said.

FARM STRESS: WHERE TO TURN WHEN YOU NEED HELP

BY EVA MOORE

The holidays are always a stressful time, 2020 is an especially stressful year, and farming is a uniquely stressful profession. As we near the end of the year, please let the farmers and farm families in your life know they don’t have to cope with stress alone. We’ve collected some resources below.

SC AGRIWELLNESS

1-800-968-8143

South Carolina Farm Bureau created the SC AgriWellness program to bring free mental health services to South Carolina farmers.

SC AgriWellness, administered by First Sun EAP, makes counseling services available to South Carolina farmers and their families free of charge. By providing access to a wealth of professional services, SC AgriWellness is a resource to support farmers as they navigate the many issues contributing to overwhelming stress affecting the well-being of South Carolina farmers and farm families. First Sun EAP’s trained professionals have participated in Clemson University Cooperative Extension Service’s Farm Stress Awareness training to better understand the issues South Carolina farmers are facing. SC Farmers and their families should reference “SC AgriWellness” when calling.
